TWO-YEAR TRAINING FOR ELECTRONICS

Dear Joyce: I would like to know the difference between an electronics technician and an electrical technician. How does one go about getting into the electronics industry?

-- J.T.H., San Antonio, Texas

Electrical technicians work mainly in the generation and transmission of electricity while electronics technicians generally work on electrical systems requiring only small amounts of power.

Electronics is not a unified industry but is composed of many companies producing some 30,000 types of electronic goods.

Sometimes the industry is divided into three parts: semiconductors; computers, calculators and related equipment; and instruments that test and measure. In another view, there are four main market areas: government products, industrial products, consumer products and components.

Whether the product is a space guidance system or a stereo, electronics technicians are in demand to help engineers design and build experimental models. Other technicians are needed to set up and repair electronic equipment for customers. Still others are hired to do complex inspection and assembly work.

Although you can learn on the job or through apprenticeship, an ideal preparation is two years' study at a public, private or military technical school. Private and public schools often operate placement offices that help you break into the field after you graduate.

One large chain of private technical schools claims 97 percent of graduates requesting placement assistance find jobs within 60 days. The chain's associate degree graduates are receiving an average starting salary of $1,219 per month.

To locate training opportunities, check with your state department of education..

A useful indication of quality in an associate-degree program is accreditation by the Technology Accreditation Commission of the Accreditation Board for Engineering and Technology; ABET is the same organization that accredits four-year colleges and universities offering engineering and engineering-related courses.

Also desirable for private schools is accreditation by the National Association of Trade and Technical Schools.

READER SERVICE: "Handbook of Trade and Technical Careers and Training" is a 48-page guide to 98 careers you can learn in two years or less, and the schools that offer them.
